"Believe it or Not!"

Robert Ripley, born LeRoy Robert Ripley, was an endlessly curious man who led an adventurous life. Aptly nicknamed the "Modern Marco Polo," he traversed the globe in search of interesting or unusual stories and artifacts.

Ripley was born during the late 19th century in Santa Rosa, California and was the son of a carpenter. From an early age, he showed an interest and aptitude in art, though he never received formal training. He also served as a member of his high school's newspaper and yearbook organizations as a teenager. His father died in 1905, prompting Ripley to drop out and work to help provide for his family.

1:00 Ripley played baseball on a semi-pro team, but later broke his arm while trying out for the Major Leagues, ending his baseball career. He turned to art. One of his cartoons, titled "The Village Bell Was Slowly Ringing," was sold to Life magazine in 1908 and kickstarted his career in the publishing industry at the tender age of 18. The following year, he relocated south to the "Fog City" and took a position as a sports cartoonist for the San Francisco Chronicle and for other newspapers in the area.

2:00 While working for the Chronicle, he met famed American author and adventurer Jack London. London, a fellow journalist and another interesting character of the period, is best known for his novels The Call of the Wild and White Fang. Both men were covering the "Battle of the Century," a boxing match between Jack Johnson and James "Jim" Jeffries in Reno. London was one of a group of people who advised Ripley to leave the West Coast behind and head to the East Coast and New York City to build a career.

Ripley took this advice and a position at the New York Globe and Commercial Advertiser, dropping his first name "LeRoy" for "Robert." His position at the Globe was not a glamorous post by any means, but the paper was a new member of a

"Canine Celebrities"

Ancestors of today's dogs were domesticated, or trained to be dependent on humans, thousands of years ago. Scientists are still working to pinpoint where canines were first domesticated through the study of archaeological specimens and genetic sampling, and some now speculate that they were domesticated in two unique regions — one time in Asia and another in Europe or perhaps the Near East. Historical evidence also shows that in ancient Egypt, those who could afford it would have their dog mummified. Ancient dog collars with words such as "Brave One" or "the king's dog" proves that the kinship between dog and man is not a new one. Regardless of the origin of domestication, one fact remains indisputable; over time, dogs have gained a reputation as mankind's loyal companion.

Snoopy from Peanuts, Toto from The Wizard of Oz, Lassie, and Scooby Doo are some of the most iconic fictional canine companions from American pop culture. In 1969, a Snoopy Astronaut 'Pocket Doll' was sent into space with astronauts, and NASA even named a lunar module "Snoopy."

Scooby Doo, an awkwardly drawn brown Great Dane, quickly became a beloved hero as a cowardly crime solver with an affinity for snacks. Interestingly, his name was inspired by a line in a song by Frank Sinatra, "Strangers in the Night." When television visionary Fred Silverman was sitting on a plane contemplating what to name his new mystery-solving cartoon dog, he heard Sinatra sing the words, "scooby-doo-be-doo." Although the words actually said were, "doobie-doo-be-do," a star was born and Scooby Doo — Where Are You? launched its first episode in in 1969.

Other iconic American dogs, like Balto, are fascinating and very real pieces of American history. Featured in a movie and later a Disney cartoon, the real Balto helped save many lives. In 1925, several children in Nome, Alaska were diagnosed with a contagious disease called diphtheria. The disease, which is caused by bacteria, can not only cause a person to suffocate from swelling in the throat, it can eventually can lead
